[Note The ecclesiastical use of L persōna does not appear before the 11th c. It was app still new at the Council of Clermont 1096, when it was said, c. iii 'Ecclesiæ vel decimæ sæpius ab Episcopis sub palliata avaritia venduntur mortuis nimirum, seu mutatis Clericis quos Personas vocant (Mansi Concilia XX 902). Various views have been taken of its genesis English legal writers, Coke, Blackstone, etc, have referred it to the Civil Law sense of persōna, the parson being viewed as the legal person by whom the property of God, the Patron Saint, or the church, in the parish, was actually held; the person to sue and be sued in respect of this property Du Cange (ed 1762), pointing to the early equivalent use of persōna and dignitās, would start from the sense 'personage, great or dignified person, dignitary'. Dr H Schaefer, Pfarrkirche und Stift im Deutschen Mittelalter (1903) § 19, shows that persōna was primarily applied to the holder of a parochial living who was non-resident, being either a conventual body, a chapter, or member of one, or often a mere layman, the spiritual duties being in either case discharged by a vicārius or substitute, who received a small portion of the revenues He refers the designation to the fact that the holder of the living merely figured in the character or rôle (cf. L. persona) of parish clergyman, without actually discharging the duties. He explains the frequent early equivalency of persona and dignitas, adduced by Du Cange, in the case of conventual or collegiate rectors, by the usual application of dignitas to the superior personages or 'dignitaries' of a chapter, and the fact that it was by these that the parochial parsonages were held. It would appear however that in England the appellation must have been early interpreted in the Civil Law sense; else how should it have been extended from the persona immortalis to the persona mortalis or resident rector, and hence become in England the legal designation?]

Pasha (pɑ·ʃă, pɑ·ʃă), forms 7–8 pascha, 7 passa, 9 pashaw, 8– pasha. [Turkish pasha, generally held to be the same as bâsha from bâsh head, chief, in some Eastern Turkish dialects pash The form with b was app the earlier, being that first adopted in Western languages see Barshaw

In Turkish there is no hard and fast line between the breath and voice stops and in the case of p, b, the confusion is increased by the absence of p in Arabic and the occasional replacement of Persian and Turkish p by b as pâpoch pâboch, Anbouche, etc thus may have conduced to interchange of b & and survival of the p in pasha Some however think pâshâ and bâshî originally distinct words (cf quot 1687) Zenker Distinguishes the latter of the Janizaries from pâshâ which is now largely a civil title; but Barbier says that the title in either form, was under the ancient régime exclusively a military one The best Turkish scholars think there is no ground for connecting the word in any way with Pers pâdishah king or emperor, Turkish pâdishâh the Sultan]

A title borne in Turkey by officers of high rank, as military commanders, and governors of provinces. Formerly, esp in the case of military commanders, written Bashaw

There are three grades of pasha, formerly distinguished by the number of horse tails displayed as a symbol in war, the highest grade (of three tails) corresponding to a commanding general, admiral, or governor of equivalent rank; the second (of two tails) to a general of division or vice-admiral, etc; the third (of one tail) to a general of brigade, rear admiral, or naval officer of corresponding rank.

Pasquil, var Pasquin, q.v.

1. Pasquinus, F Pasquin

Pasquino or Pasquillo was the name popularly given to a mutilated statue or piece of ancient statuary, disinterred at Rome early in 1501, and set up by Cardinal Caraffa at the corner of his palace near the Piazza Navona Under his patronage, it became the annual custom on St Marks Day to 'resuscitate temporarily and dress up this torso to represent some historical or mythological personage of antiquity on which occasion professors and students of the newly restored Ancient Learning were wont to salute Pasquin in Latin verses which were usually posted or placed on the statue In process of time these pasquinate or pasquinades tended to become satirical, and the term began to be applied, not only in Rome, but in other countries, to satirical compositions and lampoons, political, ecclesiastical, or personal, the anonymous authors of which often sheltered themselves under the conventional name of Pasquin According to Mazocchi, in the preface to the printed collection of the Pasquinate of 1509, the name Pasquino or Pasquillo originated in that of a schoolmaster (Alterator seu magister ludi) who lived opposite the spot where the statue was found; a later tradition given by Castelvetro, 1558–9, made Pasquino a caustic tailor or shoemaker; another of 1544 has a barber. See L. Morandi in Nuova Antologia 1884 I. 271, 755. D. Gnoli ibid 1890 I 51, 275 Storia di Pasquino The latinized form Pasquillus was already 1514 applied both to the anth r and the pasquinade, in which extended application it was subsequently followed also by Pasquin]

In Eng pass has become the most general verb expressing onward motion passing may consist in going running riding flying, swimming, sailing, floating gliding, or in being carried drawn driven impelled or moved on in any way In many cases the intrans sense can be expressed by go, especially when construed with or extended by prepositions or adverbs expressing varieties of direction etc but it can be used in many transferred senses in which go is inapplicable, e g. to pass into a new state or condition or to a new subject It differs from move in expressing the effect rather than the action Without any prepositional or adverbial extension the original and in trans. use is now chiefly confined to branches V and VI, being otherwise less frequent than the derived trans. and causal uses in B and C

As in other intrans vbs of motion (go come depart etc) the perfect of resultant condition had originally the auxiliary be he is passed they were passed cf sense 1, quot c 1380, 1 b 14 2 c 1400 etc This was sometimes retained even when pass was transitive cf sense 34, quot 1375 38, quots 14 , 1526 etc Hence arose the later PAST prep, q v

1. The name of the hilly district in the north west of Derbyshire, England, divided into the High Peak and the Low or Lower Peak, approximately corresponding to the modern Hundreds of High Peak and Wirksworth respectively

In 12–13th c the word seems to have been apprehended as the proper name of the Castle Hill at Castleton, under which is the Peak Cavern The post Conquest use of Peak in the sense of OE Peaclond seems to have arisen through the application of the name of Peverel's castle to the district thence governed. The Ordnance Map, without any warrant in local usage, gives the name 'The Peak' to an elevated plateau or mountain mass in the High Peak Hundred (see quot. 1874), in which it is followed by geography books etc

Pectin (pe ktin) Chem [f stem pect- of PECTIC + -IN 1] A white neutral substance, soluble in water, formed from PROTOSE by heating with acids, or naturally in the ripening of fruits, and constituting the gelatinizing agent in vegetable juices, in the further process of ripening, it is converted into parapectin (PARA- 2 a), metapectin, and other related substances (see PECTIC)
1838 T. THOMSON Chem Org Bodies 146 Vauquelin, who found pectin in the tamarind, considered it as the same with pectic acid. 1866-77 WATTS Dict Chem IV 364 Green fruits do not contain pectin ready formed, but only pectose.
When the fruit is ripe, the juice contains a large quantity of pectin, and still more of parapectin Lastly, fruits in the over ripe state no longer contain a trace of pectin, that substance having been converted into metapectic acid.
